Maturation-related changes in the transcriptome of in vitro expanded thymus cells. The thymus gland undergoes a dramatic involution during aging and the decline in thymopoiesis is responsible for the age-related decline in immunity and susceptibility to infections. Although expansion of thymic T cells ex vivo is a promising approach for the maintenance of immune function of aged patients, this procedure is hampered by the incapacity of the aged thymus to produce T cells, which leads to the necessity of transplantation of fresh thymus tissue. The aim of the present study was to establish 82157476af
